After a close vote with "Le Loup" by Jean-Marc Rochette and "Humans, Roya is a river" by Baudoin and Troub's, the 240 black-and-white pages of Tirabosco made the difference. The album tells, after a planetary disaster, the route of a young woman who, to join the rebels, takes refuge in the forest, faces dangers and loneliness there, before meeting a strange creature, furry like an animal and figure strong and protective feminine. At once ecological fable, anti-capitalist social critic, awakening to other emotional relationships outside of patriarchy, and other themes, neither militant nor above-ground, this powerful comic book crowns a year of graphic production particularly marked by ecology. The award also recognizes the commitment of Tom Tirabosco, whose entire work advocates for a fairer and more peaceful world, in a graphic style of perfect efficiency, and a narration of great clarity. This vision, often black, can provide a thrill of threat, between the collapse of civil war and general rampage of the planet, but where human warmth and solidarity gives a chance to get out, probably the last that we have left.
